The “Lost Diggers of Vignacourt” is a collection of over 800 of these photographic negative plates remarkably rediscovered in 1992 by French Historian Lauren Mirouze and then unearthed and brought to life by Channel 7’s Sunday Night program in 2010 with Australian War Memorial historian Peter Burness.

These “Lost Diggers of Vignacourt” and the villagers depicted in the photos give us an incredible untold insight into a story never shared. A story set behind the lines, set against the Great War, of our diggers and the French people who welcomed them into their lives in the most tragic of circumstances.

The central story of “Photos in the Attic” focuses on an Australian man who, against all the odds, must return to France, to search for someone dear to him. From the wide, unique, sun burnt landscapes of Queensland Australia, to the war torn yet lush country-sides of Europe and the cosmopolitan city of Paris, it beautifully and authentically presents the world of the past – a world and a time that was meticulously captured by Louis and Antoinette Thuillier in their celebrated photographs.

We are writing to you to update you on the latest developments happening on the way to the beginning of production of this movie in 2017. The latest news sees the appointment of Phil Avalon as our producer. Phil is one of Australia's most successful independent film producers. He is a credited Producer/Writer/Director and actor who has been at the forefront of the Australian film industry for over 40 years. We know that his skills and talents are going to make our story come to life and powerfully reveal a sometimes overlooked part of the Great War .

We are again offering you an invitation to join us and become a “Friend” of the “Photos in the Attic” project. By becoming a “Friend of Photos in the Attic” project you can choose to receive a range of special limited edition commemorative packs that will allow you to be part of this amazing project as it becomes a reality. More details of the various “Friends of “ commemorative packs are available in the following pages.

We hope that you can join us on this incredible journey for a truly remarkable project that will further celebrate our diggers in the Great War.

Our best regards

Michael and Donna Fiechtner
